The triumph of time (Cities in flight) by James Blish

Publisher: Avon (1966) ASIN: B0007HBJ2O

The post-WWII decade also produced science fiction's boldest novel about the end of the Universe: John Blish's The Triumph of Time.-- (John Clute / Encyclopedia of Science Fiction)

All four novels are available on Amazon as "Cities In Flight"

by James Blish, Betty Ballantine, Richard D. Mullen

Publisher: Overlook Press (January 17, 2005) ISBN: 1585676020

The fourth of the "Cities in Flight" novels depicting entire cities taking to outer space in the year 2018. In this novel, mankind finds out that two universes were doomed to inevitable, catastrophic collision in 3 years time. (Novels include: A Life for the Stars; Earthman, Come Home; and The Triumph of Time and are published together as: "Year 2018!; A Life for the Stars; Earthman, Come Home; and The Triumph of Time")

In three years' time the two universes were doomed to inevitable, catastrophic collision! When the scientists of the wandering planet, journeying through inter-galactic space, heard the sound of hydrogen atoms coming into existence out of nothing, they realized that they had accidentally discovered the birthplace of continuous creation. They had lifted the curtain & caught an instant's glimpse of the unknowable. But to have looked it full in the face could have been no more fatal. For later, much later, they were to learn that they had also uncovered mankind's Day of Judgment!

Gem of an ending for the conclusion

By 2theD

The conclusion to the Cities in Flight saga is of book #4: The Triumph of Time. Like the first three stories, this story is of a struggle between the city and its administrators against an encroaching evil. However, book #4 ramps up the clash of confrontation by adding a parallel of sparring matches. This may seem to be an engaging aspect of the book, but the two clashes are as bipolar as the word suggests thereby rendering the collective book, as a whole, to feel stitched together.

Within the first conflict, the City is taken under hostage by religious extremists who protest over New Earth's use of the philosophy called Stochasticism. The conflict is quickly resolved through some quick wit reminiscent of the classic problem/solution sort of science fiction back from the 50s and 60s. The plot moves forward into the second and more interesting conflict- that with the realities of a parallel anti-matter universe and the coming of the end of the universe by June 3rd, 4104. It's only in the last forty or so pages that the story really begins to pick up pace because the first eighty pages had me putting the book up and down like no tomorrow as I was beginning to doubt Blish's grand finale. The finale is chocked full of based-on-reality physics and hypothetical physics, too, where the cast find that their fate is drawing ever so closer. The implications of their actions are a fantastic conclusion to a somewhat lengthy, yet important, but also rather dry series.

APOCALYPSE!

When the scientists of the wandering planet, journeying through inter-galactic space, heard the sound of hydrogen atoms coming into existence out of nothing, they realized that they had accidentally discovered the birthplace of continuous creation.

They had lifted the curtain and caught an instant's glimpse of the Unknowable. But to have looked it full in the face could have been no more fatal...

For later, much later, they were to learn that they had also uncovered mankind's Day of Judgment!
